Issac R Lands is one of Lanoxeter counto's best known farmers. He lives at Lannext night to see if the mystericus rooter would gay a second visit to the field. The farmer remained until he got sleepy, and, no watch for the heg if he had to stay up all night. He took his bleed man with him that night, and his gun, and the two watch ed until almost devilight. Nothing appeared and the farmer and his man were on the point of going home, when something clear ed the high fence around the field at a singie bound, and, lauding among the potate vince, began at once to root them up. That the animal which had come late the field ed suddenly and so nimbly was a hog there could be no doubt, but he was long and lank and white as a sheep. His shout was long and sharp, and as he turned up the yis'ding soil and feasted on the tender young potatoes his grunts of satisfaction were frequent and loud. He had made his sudden appearance from a field of tall and heavy wheat which adjoined Farmer Landis's po-just threw up his head and looked at me a second or two, then gave a snort you could ing, made for the fence as fast as uny deer could run. He bounded over it casier than came known as the wild hog, appeared no more in that farmer Landis's potato patch but a day or so later he was seen to leave another wheat field, bound over a fence into another farmer Landis's potato patch, proceed to appease his hunger's wrath by rooting up that farmer's early pototoes. There it was discovered that he had two immense tusks, extending upward four or five inches on each side of his sharp, long snort, giving him a most ferocious appearance. He was shot at and egain bounded straight for the nearest potato field, and his speed gave him such a start of all pursuers that he had time to root up and get away with a good meal before he was again warn that was last week, when he appeared sud-denly in a potate field near the first farmer Landle's. Being disturbed, he again per-formed his marvelous bounding and vault-ing feat and returned to the protection of the ripening grain. Everybody knows he is in there, but they do not care to tramp down twenty or thirty seres of wheat trying to find him. Toe sporting friends of Landis Valley farmers are waiting anxiously for the cutting of the wheat, and they expect rare sport charing the wild bog when he is driven

No one can imagine where this wild, potate-destroying monster cou'd have come from, as this is the very heart of the great and fertile county of Lancaster, where opportunity or advantage is offered for the breeding or nurturing of wild hogs, especially of the kind that runs like a doer and vaults like a champion gymnast.

dis Valley, Pa., where pretty much every-HIBBERY'S POSITIVE CURE dis Valley. Pa., where protty much every-Farmer Landle knows a thing when he saes is, and could not be induced to lie about it. Will positively BREAK UP Chi is and Fever in- Potatoes is a favorite crop on the Landis farm, and if anything goes wrong with that crop it sits heavy on farmer Landis's heart-Hence, when he want out early one morning about three weeks ago and found three long rows of a choice brand of early potato plants, which were just beginning to take on an annudance of tubers, dug up and rulned, be was disconsolate. The strange thing about the tearing up of the plants was that only the rows of early potatoes were molested. The late once were not disturbed. The monrer in which the damage had been done satisfied farmer Landis that it was the work of a hog or hoge, but some of his hoge could got to the file, and it was impossible for any of the neighbors' hege to get there. But that a hog had rooted in that field former Landis was sure, and be lay in weit hog appearing, he went home.

Next morning a still greater area of early potato vines were found rooted up in the field. Then Farmer Landis resolved to

The farmer did not waste much time in watching the devastating and mysterious hog, but whanged away at him with his gun, which was loaded with buckshot.

"My aim was good, I know," said Farmer Lendis, relating the experience, "and I was only a couple of reds away, but that hog have beard a quarter of a mile, and, turna hurdle racer could have done it, and dis sppeared in the wheat."

The mysterious hog, which at once be-away, apparently unburt, into the wheat.

He was not seen again for several days although a watch was set on all sides of the wheat field to give the alarm if he appeared.

Finally hunger for young potatoes drove him forth from his lair amid the ripening grain and he ran the gauntlet of watchers, and leaping the fence as before, without touchhe sped away across country at a speed which an old Lancester fox bunter said no deer could begin to equal. The un-reasonable and unconventional hog made ed by a peppering of buckshot against his tough hide that he could afford to retreat to the shelter of a wheat field near by. He has been seen but once since theu, and
